Center for a New ... Thinking about the psychology of nuclear proliferation in this way suggests a number of lessons for American and international policymakers. First, not every nuclear program is a nuclear weapons program. Nuclear weapons are not the natural outgrowth of technological development, but rather a transcendental political choice. Smith College: NewsSmith Using political psychology, Michael Cohen examines historical cases and shows that new nuclear states learn from their brushes with disaster and come to appreciate that while their arsenals may protect them, they are too dangerous to provide leverage to make gains. This is a significant contribution to our knowledge." — When Proliferation Causes Peace |
